

To whom it may concern

4 June 2012

Recently, Aarhus Academy for Global Education (AAGE) opened ensuring Central Denmark Region a comprehensive, world-class education from pre-kindergarten to Ph.D.

The establishment of AAGE is the result of a movement started by a small group of local and national companies that envisioned an international school that would not only help them recruit and retain international talent, but also mirror the City of Aarhus and the Central Denmark Region's commitment to being a people who work together to find innovative and common solutions to the world's challenges.

AAGE's vision of a campus that combines high academic goals with international service and social responsibility, while strengthening the local community reflects the innovative and international culture of Central Denmark where business, government, research and education work hand in hand to create an attractive European place of the future.

I strongly support AAGE's vision as well as the commitment to offering international families and children as inspiring framework for learning and I hope to see AAGE flourish as an institution that exemplifies our commitment to innovation, co-operation and sustainable growth needed to meet the global challenges.
