Mayor of Aarhus

The first day of this month marked a historic day for Aarhus. With the opening of Aarhus Academy for Global Education (AAGE), the city can offer the region a comprehensive, world-class education, from Pre-Kindergarten to Ph.D.

This past year, a small cohort of local and national companies envisioned opening an international school that would not only help them recruit and retain international talent, but also mirror the city's commitment to being a people who work together to find innovative solutions to the world's problems.

AAGE's vision of a campus that combines high academic goals with international service and social responsibility, while strengthening the local community, is aligned to the city's aim to become the European Capital of Culture in 2012. A place where culture, business and government work hand in hand to create an attractive city of the future.

I heartily support AAGE's vision as well as the commitment to offering international families and children an inspiring framework for learning and growing, and I hope to see AAGE flourish as an institution that exemplifies the city's framework for innovation, development and growth needed to meet the challenges of the future.
